War broke out Sunday evening in Hayti, near Hartford, with C. Parks and Dr. Walker at principal belligerents. The trouble seems to have arisen at the home of Shanks Brooks, where several had gathered in to imbibe a jug of "red hot foot" which Shanks had on hand. They imbibed and became gay, especially C. Parks and Dr. Walker, who began with a few uncomplicated terms of endearment and then, suddenly, without warning, and without cause, they began to quarrel and hit each other in a manner that would have done credit to a prize fight. One came up with a painful gag across his head, and a fight broke out in the hands of C. Parks and Dr. Walker. The fight was the major portion of his sufferings. "Choked off," while C. Parks was very red and puffed about the face and eyes and his right thumb and likewise "choked off."

Just at this point there was a cessation of active hostilities and C. Parks, who had been with the fight, made an ugly wound on his head, and the fight was dropped and the clenching scene at the time was witnessed. The weapons, which was a rock in the hands of Dr. Walker instead of the griddle in the hands of C. Parks as before. They came in at the picture and separated them and the battle ceased. They were both arrested by Marshal Lyons and deputy U. S. Warden.

the bear still after him. He succeeded in reaching the first stall in safety and the door being open, he rubbed in and climbed over a cross piece of timber near the roof, thus ending the race. Her keeper then came up and lassoed her and prevented further trouble.

Taking into consideration the distance the boy ran—between 50 and 60 yards—and most of the way through water from three inches to a foot deep—it was almost a miracle that he was not overhauled and torn to pieces. Sam says he never looked back once, as he could feel the warm breath of the bear on his back, and that the splash-water in his face from head to foot did not even jumpy, and that he realized his only chance was to outrun her.

Charlie and Zettl pulled, "Run, Sam, run," but he says while he needed attention, he was not so much as he appeared. He was a good one, as he never intended to lose that race.

Sam is 13 years old and as proved by his back, is a good one. His father was the whole affair, but was too far away to aid him.
